

Skip-YouTube.com is a website that allows you to navigate through YouTube using only a SKIP button. We wanted to alter the viewing experience and make the encounter a much more random affair. We wanted to reinstate the element of chance and enable the viewer to discover content that they weren't necessarily looking for. We have abolished titles, tags and descriptions as it is about limiting the control over information.

You can view, but only randomly selected material. You can decide to skip contents, but only after an initial exposure to it. To a certain extent, you expose yourself to the decisions of an algorithm that you don't understand, you give up control over the media delivered to you, but can still derive enjoyment and pleasure from it.

Non-determinism rules the experience; you can view, sometimes you can skip, but you cannot search. You cannot determine what you watch.

Skip-YouTube.com is a collaborative project between Bertie Müller and Matthew Britton.
